We have shown that concentrations of IL-6, IL-8 and TNF-α were higher in animals injected with LPS but were significantly reduced in animals injected with the combination of STZ and LPS. This observation is consistent with previous reports which showed that the in vitro administration of cytokines failed to induce the production of reactive oxygen species in pancreatic islets \[[@CR29], [@CR30]\]. We also observed that STZ+LPS injection induced a significant decrease in the body weight of the mice. It has been demonstrated that STZ induced severe diabetes-like symptoms \[[@CR23]\]. The effects of IL-6 on the body weight of NOD mice have not been previously examined. However, Ding et al. \[[@CR31]\] found that IL-6 levels increased in NOD/scid mice with severe diabetes. In contrast to these findings, the present study demonstrated that IL-6 treatment did not alter the body weight of mice. Conversely, previous studies have shown that the injection of IL-6 improved the body weight of STZ-induced diabetic mice \[[@CR32]\], and treatment of 3T3 cells with IL-6 improved their survival rate \[[@CR33]\]. These discrepancies may be attributable to the difference in the severity of diabetes, and the IL-6 dosages used. In addition, differences in genetic backgrounds between the mouse strains and the immune status of the animals, or the methods used, could explain the conflicting results. In the present e79caf774b
