The role of the luteinizing hormone-releasing hormone in the control of LH secretion in the normal and tumor-bearing rat. The role of the luteinizing hormone-releasing hormone (LHRH) in the control of LH secretion was investigated in normal and tumor-bearing rats. Atropine-treated rats were implanted with a sustained release capsule containing LHRH or a control implant. Four weeks after implantation, the animals were treated with bromocriptine (BR) or LHRH. The levels of serum LH were measured by radioimmunoassay. Both BR and LHRH given alone resulted in a significant increase of serum LH. The LHRH produced a greater increase of serum LH, while BR produced a stronger LH-releasing response. When rats bearing a Leydig cell tumor were treated with BR or LHRH, a similar increase of serum LH was seen with both drugs. The LHRH release in tumor-bearing rats was also similar to the release in normal animals. It is concluded that LHRH is not primarily involved in the control of LH secretion in rats bearing a Leydig cell tumor.
