Effect of dose size on the behavior of internal dosimeters in Beagle dogs. Internal dosimeters are widely used for monitoring low-level environmental exposure of workers in our workplace. In the present study, we investigated the effect of the dose size on the dosimetric behavior of ICR-191 and Cs-137 in Beagle dogs. Measurements were carried out using a surface dosimeter after a single oral administration of 25, 50, 100, 200, 400, 600 or 1000 microCi (10 microL dose solution) of ICR-191 and after an intravenous administration of 1, 2, 5, 10, 25, 50, or 100 microCi of Cs-137. The bioassay, quantitative autoradiographic and glass plate autoradiographic analyses were performed. The internal dosimetry of ICR-191 was influenced by the dose size. The relative activity of ICR-191 as a function of the dose size was expressed by a relative biologic half-life curve. The biologic half-life was estimated to be 27.6+/-2.6 days from the relative activity at the 95% confidence level (n=6). The biologic half-life of Cs-137 was not influenced by the dose size. The autoradiographic analyses showed that the proportion of the administered dose in excreted Cs-137 was not affected by the dose size. The bioassay and glass plate autoradiographic analyses demonstrated that the proportion of absorbed dose to the soft tissues in the oral cavity was not significantly influenced by the dose size. In conclusion, the dosimetric behavior of ICR-191 was different from that of Cs-137. When the oral dose is small, the oral dose size should be used as the basic unit for the internal dosimetry of ICR-191.
