1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to computer-controlled motors and, more particularly, to providing redundancy and improved control of a computer-controlled motor. 2. Background Information Conventional linear actuators are well known in the art of manufacturing and assembly to move different components relative to other components of an assembly. Conventional linear actuators typically include a carriage, a motor, a lead screw, and a plurality of balls or bearings positioned between the carriage and the lead screw to reduce friction and wear. In addition, precision control devices, such as encoders, are typically associated with the lead screw and are provided to determine the position of the carriage relative to the lead screw, thereby determining the position of the carriage relative to the lead screw, thereby determining the movement of the carriage and, thus, the different components of the assembly relative to each other. Many conventional linear actuators are configured as a part of a processing system, a handling system, a transfer system or the like and are used to effect precise movement of different components of an assembly. For example, the linear actuators may be used to move a part or a component of an assembly to a desired position relative to another part or component of the assembly. In a conventional linear motor, a coil is positioned around a magnetic core of the motor, and an armature plate is slidably positioned between the coil and the magnetic core. A shaft is coupled to the armature plate and, as the coil is energized and the armature plate is driven towards the core, the armature plate rotates and the shaft is driven out of the armature plate. By varying the energy delivered to the coil, the rate of rotation of the shaft may be
