Smooth muscle differentiation of malignant ovarian tumors: an immunohistochemical study. The epithelial lining of smooth muscle differentiation in the ovary is usually a benign lesion or a nodule of smooth muscle. Malignant transformation of this lining is thought to be exceedingly rare. We have observed a variety of malignant ovarian tumors that have smooth muscle differentiation in a trabecular and reticular pattern in which the smooth muscle is located in nests of neoplastic epithelial cells that resemble malignant serous epithelium. To better characterize this phenomenon, the cases of three malignant ovarian tumors with smooth muscle differentiation were examined. In one case, the neoplastic cells were arranged in nests and strands that resembled those described in the above-mentioned cases. In another case, the tumor consisted of spindle and ovoid cells that resembled smooth muscle cells in size and morphology. In a third case, smooth muscle differentiation was seen in the epithelium of cavitory spaces. Morphologic and phenotypic studies demonstrated that the cells comprising these three tumors have a smooth muscle differentiation. Although this differentiation is usually of benign significance, we recognize that this differentiation can also be a malignant neoplasm. This case series of malignant ovarian tumors with smooth muscle differentiation is the first in the literature. Using a knowledge-based system to improve the management of sepsis. Paediatric intensive care units (PICUs) are complex environments in which many aspects of patient care need to be monitored, evaluated, or improved in order to provide the best possible care. There are an increasing number of studies investigating the use of electronic clinical decision support systems to aid in the delivery of efficient and effective patient care. Although the evidence of their effectiveness in improving PICU management is small, more recent studies suggest that they may be effective. This article reports
