Screenshot:Q: Why do Chrome/Safari play videos when I scroll a page? When I scroll this web page in Chrome or Safari the video stops playing as soon as my mouse leaves the window edge. I know I can scroll to keep the video playing by using the scroll wheel, but I don't want to do this. I want it to start playing as soon as the mouse leaves the window edge. Is there a fix for this problem? Thanks A: It's not your fault. This is a default action on most users' computer screens. When you scroll and the mouse hovers over the window, the scroll event stops and the video is played. This is a pretty common default because when there's a scroll event it means that your mouse moved away from the edge of the browser and is over content in the window. This means that the mouse is no longer on the screen. When a mouse is no longer on the screen, the mouse grabs the title bar. When that happens, the scroll window stops and the user sees the content that's on the opposite side of the scroll window. When the user scrolls to that side again, the event fires again and the cycle repeats. Just about all modern browsers will scroll the window with your mouse. That's why it's a common default. Things that could make it work with the mouse are: Make sure that your scroll size isn't too wide. The scroll event stops when the mouse is on the opposite side of the scroll window. If it's not wide enough, it won't trigger the event. If the browser isn't wide enough, your mouse's scroll wheel could be causing the window to scroll. I've seen this before where the mouse is able to scroll but the window isn't. The fix is to turn the mouse wheel off. Amino acid composition of the bovine pituitary gland. The present
