A thermosensitive and microbubble ultrasound contrast agent: In vitro and in vivo evaluation of the microbubble aggregation-mediated drug delivery in the absence of ultrasound irradiation. Microbubble ultrasound contrast agent (USCA) is generally used for diagnostic and therapeutic purposes. However, such microbubbles are difficult to deliver to target sites because they are quickly cleared by the reticuloendothelial system (RES). We have developed a thermosensitive nanomicelle for the delivery of small molecule drug. The nanomicelles are prepared from DSPE-PEG2000-COOH (MPC), which forms vesicles upon heating at 40 °C and gradually dissolves at 37 °C. This thermosensitive nanomicelle shows improved stability and can undergo controlled disassembly and release a small molecule drug when stimulated by mild ultrasound irradiation. In vitro and in vivo studies were performed to evaluate the effect of ultrasound irradiation on the release properties of the thermosensitive nanomicelle. Biodistribution study in mice showed that MPC nanomicelles were found in the liver after intravenous injection and accumulated in the tumor mass. The accumulation of nanoparticles was further enhanced by ultrasound irradiation. The tumor retention time in mice was much longer than that of free MPC when the nanomicelles were injected by the intravenous route. A dual contrast-therapeutic combination system for tumor treatment was developed using the nanomicelles. Transmission electron microscopy revealed that the nanomicelles were found to be in the form of vesicles. Furthermore, MPC-encapsulated dye-labeled nanomicelles were shown to be a good platform for targeted drug delivery. It is anticipated that these thermosensitive nanomicelles and the developed drug delivery system can be used for improved tumor targeted drug delivery.Q: Check availability of array values in PHP I have a database table which is an inventory of different products. Luxembourg: The Luxist The unique history of Luxembourg has been shaped by its neighbors. It was Germanic tribes that first decided to settle down in the rich river valley of the Meuse, about 10 BC. Their capital was moved several times to the Rhine, but Dacia was given up for lost. Until 15 BC, when the Romans controlled the area, Dacia was the scene of a number of rebellions and invasions by Celtic tribes. About AD 200, the Romans under Emperor Septimius Severus made an alliance with the king of the area, who built his capital there. His descendants became the limes (here, line of encampments) on the Roman-influenced model. In the 5th century, the Franks invaded and conquered, and by the end of the century, the Merovingian dynasty ruled the territory. In the 7th century, the area was overrun by Germanic tribes, and Charlemagne brought it under his control. He reigned for 30 years and introduced Christianity. When he died in 814, his children divided the kingdom into three counties. Luxembourg went to Lothair, but during the 10th century, territory was returned to Germany and was reduced to a duchy. In the 12th century, the duchy was conquered by the French. About this time, a small church was built, and the town of Luxembourg was founded. The family of the Merovingian king, Merie, was still ruling when the Romans conquered again in the 5th century. The Merovingian kings claimed the title of duke and called themselves Roii. By AD 700, they were using the title Rex Francorum. (See map above.) The Merovingian rex died in AD 751, when his son died without issue. The duchy was then inherited by two of the Merovingian kings' great-uncles, and passed through the family until AD 840. Bishop Hatto of Metz established a castle in the Meuse river valley for the Merovingian king, who would live at the castle until the end of his life. Hatto had the church, whose modern name is Notre-Dame de Corbeil, built on the hill. When the new castle was completed, he founded the ducal capital there. The dynasty was not immediately
