The present invention relates to a detector for measuring the amount of light received by a photodetector. In particular, in two-dimensional image pick-ups, photodetectors are used which have an array of photosensitive elements. The power supply voltage is generally limited in order to ensure a sufficient dynamic range and noise immunity. This power supply voltage limit in fact results in a reduction in the number of signalized elements. The power supply of each element must thus have a certain minimum power which must be calculated on the basis of the light intensity received by the photodetector. When the intensity of the light received by the photodetector is very weak, the detection of an image is no longer possible. At present, the prior art solutions envisage a modification of the photosensitive element, the magnitude of which is associated with the intensity of the received light, or even a method for increasing the power supply voltage to the photodetector, thereby increasing the minimum power which it is able to supply. However, this solution does not allow any flexibility in the computation of the minimum power which the photodetector can supply.
