## Formatting Your Images for the Web When you're beginning the "Photoshopization" of your images, you may be tempted to format them with professional standards. But the truth is that not all images are formatted the same way. Digital photos are flexible and allow for a wide variety of display and delivery options. Here are some of the more popular choices for web image formats: * **JPEG** : The most popular compression format for images in general, JPEG is the traditional format for photographs. JPEG files compress information (bits) about an image, and the greater the compression, the smaller the file size. * **PNG** : This _lossless_ (don't need to use up bits) compression format is gaining popularity. It's capable of delivering the quality of other formats. You'll see this compression format used for transparency, or in images that are being used in multiple layers. * **GIF** : GIF is an image format that's popular for creating logos and other small images. It's also nice for creating flat-style backgrounds. * **TIF** : TIF is an older format that's used in the digital darkroom. It's ideal for archiving your images. It's not as commonly used on the Web as JPEG, but you may find it useful for this purpose. * **SVG** : SVG is a vector format. It's ideal for creating complex artwork and for objects that are scaled to any size without losing resolution. It's also excellent for animation and other multimedia uses. Be aware that not all image files are created equal. You may find that when a picture

Q: Firebase firestore: check for existence of key if non empty I have firestore data like this: buyers uid_1 listName: "foo" listValue: "x" uid_2 listName: "bar" listValue: "y" uid_3 listName: "cheese" listValue: "z" uid_4 listName: "bakers" listValue: "z" I am trying to check to see if a particular list exists. If it doesn't exist, I want to populate with a value of 0, otherwise I want to populate with the listValue. I am currently trying this code but it returns a null object reference. var newListValue = listValue != null? listValue : "0" A: You don't have to use the inbuilt collection get() method to check for a non-empty value. What you should be doing is, once you get a reference to the collection, loop through and check for existence of the value. Use the find() method to achieve this. Alternatively, the inbuilt document get() method will be more appropriate in your case, you can use it in combination with a condition for checking if it's not a null or undefined value. Also note that in the case of List Value, you will always get a value for it which is an array object. So, in your case, listValue: "x" will always map to [x].

Q: Why does the Eclipse Plugin-in-plugin work? I tried to use the Eclipse plugin-in-plugin in Eclipse 4.3.1 and it works and well, but as far as I understand it, it is impossible to use a plugin without building the plugin into Eclipse. But it is easy to use a plugin from the plugin's home page (as seen at so it's not that far fetched that the same happens for the eclipse-plugin-in-plugin. Maybe I'm wrong in assuming that Eclipse will internally build the plugin-in-plugin or some other variation in the future. So my question is: why is it working now and how should I use a plugin-in-plugin? What is the correct way? A: For the reason that you can install a plugin from an URL (that is not packaged as an Eclipse installer): when you install a plugin that is not packaged as an installer, you just get a.zip file. If you unzip that file and take a look at the MANIFEST.MF in the root, you'll find the ID in there. When you then launch the main bundle of an installer-packaged plugin, this ID is then resolved. In the case of the eclipse-plugin-in-plugin, the main bundle is your Eclipse plug-in, so you need no additional plugin to know, that you need to install something here. This is done in the Eclipse plugin-in-plugin by installing the Eclipse plug-in first. The effects of epinephrine on mortality from acute myocardial infarction. In a recent report,
