Sociological model (structuralism) The sociological model or the structuralist model was the prevailing model of sociological research in France during the period 1950 to 1980. To this day, the model remains influential on academic research in all fields of sociology. History Origins The sociological model was based on three key concepts. The first of these was the functionalist model, which emphasized the segmentary character of social structure and the minimal social interaction required to maintain social structures. Second, the structuralist model emphasized the "structural coupling" of the social structure (with its segmentary and relational characteristics) with the individual (with its individualistic and relational characteristics). Finally, the political character of the model emerged from the anti-Marxist work of Pierre Bourdieu and his anti-structuralist adaptations
