With the “HyperMotion Technology,” players move with both realistic and over-the-top animations. Players transfer the momentum of their movements, delivering player awareness and feeling of being in the game. Players can make change-of-direction moves with greater agility, making on-the-ball actions much more intuitive and spontaneous. Players can also slip, rotate, spin and defend much more naturally, delivering more refined defensive control. The data from the HyperMotion Technology is used to enrich the gameplay experience of all aspects of FIFA. Players will be able to move naturally and fluidly while fighting for the ball, while also performing a variety of smooth, high-intensity attacking moves, as well as defensive challenges. The FIFA “HyperMotion Technology” is being showcased at EA Play in Los Angeles. MD simulations on Laponite dispersions containing cetylpyridinium chloride were carried out to get insights on the molecular mechanisms underlying the crystallization of spherulites and their kinetics. Specifically, we focused on the role of local microenvironmental conditions induced by the presence of a Coulombic attraction between Laponite particles that promote the formation of clusters leading to the presence of metastable states and kinetics of these metastable states. The comparison between MD and MD simulations of self-assembly and relaxation mechanisms based on a simple extended Flory-Huggins model showed that the minimum amount of Laponite required for the onset of crystallization in the presence of an attractive interaction as well as the kinetics of crystallization are different from those in the absence of attractive interactions. In the presence of repulsive interactions, the nucleation occurs via a mechanism characterized by the adsorption of liquid layers without significant liquid-liquid separation, an effect that remains accentuated at shorter timescales. The crystal growth is slower than in the absence of the attractive interaction. In the latter case, crystallization occurs by a mechanism in which the crystal grows at higher speeds characterized by the occurrence of liquid-liquid separation and involves two distinct nucleation events. These observations were further analyzed using a new MD method based on free energy calculations, the Simulated Annealing Monte Carlo method (SA-MC). It was found that the attractive interaction significantly increases the local density of the system, which translates into a higher
