Looking for the Hack-You+AnyOne (YC+) Personal 4K Camera? VisitÂ . Lots of people are interested in this products. But many of us worry whether these review products are fake. of its quality, operating system and software program. Free.Just a short while back, we reported how NVIDIA CEO Jen-Hsun Huang had proclaimed that the company will continue to "explore" what they refer to as big data, artificial intelligence, and quantum computing. And that's not the first time that we've seen NVIDIA associate themselves with AI. Previously, when they were acquired by The Tylenol Company, Inc. (and later merged with McNeil Pharmaceutical, Inc. and became McNeil Consumer Healthcare), they created an internal research lab named the "Interactive Computing Center," which was best known for their work in "human-computer interaction" and "human-robot interaction." Here's what Jen-Hsun Huang had to say on the subject: "We are exploring various technologies including 'big data' in which most of the data is collected passively, so that we can bring all the data together for analysis at the end of a process. We also see potential for A.I., machine learning, and quantum computing to transform how we interact with a device." He also further elaborated that: "…the company can't afford to write off the vast majority of devices that never find a new generation. Our answer is to expand the user base to cover many different types of people. We're building a platform for more people to use the devices — by making it easier to create and share content, enriching the content they want, and enabling them to express themselves on their terms." If this is true, it would mean that NVIDIA will be launching a new mobile computing platform in the near future, and that said platform will essentially aim to "fill the void" that nearly 5 billion people have found on Google's Pixel, which is largely becoming a niche product.
