Also, he did not have time to develop it further. Fredrik later wrote a short description of his project and uploaded it to a public access server, where it was found by thousands of users. They all got in touch and requested that it be made into a software package that would be suitable for general use. Fredrik found that he did not have the necessary programming knowledge to complete the development of a proper software package and hence abandoned the project again. Erik Johansson decided to help the project by developing a GUI for the already existing source code. There was already extensive code written by Fredrik. Erik finished the development and had the first version ready in 2006. However, Fredrik had not had the time to start development of the necessary database functionality. In 2007, Fredrik decided to return to work on his project. He was able to finish the database and database sync functionality. After that, Fredrik was no longer able to keep up with his own developments. Erik had, by now, already hired a programmer that could handle the database development. Erik, after interviewing several programmers, was successful in choosing Douglas Ilicic who would take over the development of the project. Version 1.0.0 June 4, 2006 (coding) April 9, 2007 (database, database sync, Windows GUI) A: As people have mentioned (and I have since verified), Time Machine (the Time Machine backup app from Apple) does exactly this, and does it pretty well.
