Should give it a shot. I wasn't very impressed with the combat but the world is really impressive and the lore is pretty good. [Translation] by gamelanzz-talk-55

I've finished setting up the new AI system for the World of Darkness: Herald of Oblivion game.

I've also finished full play testing of the Final Fantasy XIV game. Overall the play test results were great, but there were some areas for which I think I've over or underestimated how people would use them. (Although it's hard to imagine anyone new to the game playing this way, since few if any other games do this).

The biggest issue with the game is that very few games allow the mage to set their spells in a queue, and then literally release with them all at once. (Yes, I know about the combat res on the spellbook in Final Fantasy XIV, but you still need to be setting, and queueing spells somewhere else first).

I've added this feature. However, I think I might have made it too complicated. I've implemented casting priority by job type, but that doesn't work for all cases. For example, when a mage transforms into a beast (or other monster form) to use a full-body spell, that will also requeue the spell the mage is waiting to use, making the order go one spell further off. This leads to much confusion. (Trading places on the line for a beast form is one example).

I've also set up a system where the mage can set a black
