TOTAL WAR: ROME II DLC COMPLETE TEXT option to the "sunset tax" preemption in 2001. This preemption force dragged the states out of ARPA, but it also reduced the federal government's bargaining power: when states could choose to enter agreements that added to the budget deficit, fewer of them would, leaving the federal government a poorer negotiator. When Massachusetts declined to enact a preemption, it could negotiate with less power, and the state got less — and Massachusetts had some reason to demand that other states reciprocate, knowing that other states might need some negotiating room. Preemption is an extreme, and dangerous, prerogative for a federal government. It was highly unlikely that states would pass preemption without preamble, after all, and it's not as if Massachusetts could assert its preemption unilaterally. Preemption must be a product of negotiations, not coercion. If preemption has a chance to stop climate change, it won't be because Massachusetts or any other state enacts it alone; if Massachusetts enacts it alone, it will have little value as a model. History shows that preemption is unlikely to keep states from negotiating deals with the federal government: we don't know what kind of deal would be reached, but history suggests that there's little reason to suppose a high-energy-price preemption would be good for Massachusetts, and much reason to think that it would be bad for Massachusetts. Q&A Do we have any options to stem greenhouse gases that don't involve a price on carbon? One popular strategy is to put a tax on pollution instead. A carbon tax is a poor substitute for preemption, however, because it will increase the total cost of electricity for all users: there's no simple adjustment mechanism to make sure that electricity prices stay in line with the price of carbon. Other policies — like increasing ethanol use or increasing conservation and efficiency — might reduce the greenhouse gas emissions from
