EMG is a very useful clinical tool for evaluating masticatory muscles in the masseter muscle. Conventional EMG has difficulty recognizing true masseter muscle activity caused by the pathology of the masticatory muscles. To use a new method to evaluate the masticatory muscles by EMG and classify it in order to determine the approximate timing of a muscle activation. We classified the electromyographic spontaneous activity (ESAs) of the masseter muscle from 30 normal volunteers and examined its variation with respect to the jaw opening angle. To identify a masseter activation, we needed to know the initial position of the jaw. It was possible to recognize true masseter muscle activity by combining measurements of the initial position of the jaw and the dynamic measurement of the masticatory muscles. This result suggests that the variation of the location of the mandible and a new method is needed to precisely evaluate the masticatory muscles by EMG.Q: Passing parameters to Lambda Expression?
