A game engine specifically designed to handle a large number of dedicated AI players is key to delivering a level of interaction and drama not seen before in the game. In an effort to get as close as possible to the real experience, 22 players (14 from England and eight from Germany) were filmed in motion capture suits performing a complete, high-intensity football match. A total of 466 hours was captured during filming over 13 days. The level of movement used was “aggressive,” meaning the players were running at full speed during the match. This accelerates the player animations and allows for impressive and realistic visuals, despite the scale of the motion capture. The captured animations result in more fluid running and shooting animations for goalkeepers and defenders. Multiple cameras were used to capture player movement, which means the animation data can be used in multiple ways throughout gameplay, complementing the camera system which is already present in all modes. “A lot of people are saying ‘these are just little animations’ but think about a goalkeeper running from one post to another, and players tackling and fighting for the ball,” explained Dennis Sager, lead gameplay designer, and producer of FIFA 22. “When you put them on a pitch, especially in a game of this scale, it makes a big difference to the game. The more that the players are willing to run, the more action there is on the pitch. We found that when players are running from one corner of the pitch to the other, it feels like you're on the real pitch." Starting with the injury system, players will react to how much they are being stretched with tearing and spraining injuries, and will finish games with broken bones and muscle tears. The injury system will also be at the heart of a new "dignity" system where, when a player is knocked unconscious, they can rest on the ground and recover, and then be revived. The period of unconsciousness will be brief, and the player can be revived by teammates or even by referees. This player will then receive a medical injury to reflect their condition when they return to the pitch. The dignity system also includes the ability to walk on for a substitution with a limp, while affecting the team's overall attitude towards the match. "We put a lot of things in to try and go beyond the fake doctor and the flag," said Sager. "Whether it's head
