Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to receptacles for electronic equipment, and more particularly, to those which are suited to receive the heat-generating components of small, portable electronic equipment, including computer systems. 2. Description of the Prior Art Computer systems, such as personal computers and the like, have become more and more portable. While this has been possible for several years, the popularity of small, lightweight computers is such that they are now being used at an increasing rate. In particular, portable or "laptop" computers are now commonplace. As a consequence of their small size, computers must be compact, yet at the same time they must still contain a sufficient amount of circuitry to be useful and desirable to the user. One of the areas in which this is most evident is in the cooling of the internal electronic components of the computer. There are many components that generate heat, including the CPU, disk drives, CD-ROM drives, power supply, and video graphics card, to name a few. Heat must be transferred to a heat
