What's new:

and America's Biggest Military Blunder 40. "The Bulge" In early January 1945, the Wehrmacht sat at its wits end, unable to plug a hole in France's line that had been inching northward since the fall. Suddenly, American armies were appearing on the German landscape and stirring the pots of the beaten German army. 1944. Adolf Hitler was dictating his eastern campaign to the commander in chief of the Wehrmacht, General von Rundstedt, who was trying to dictate his own strategy to the commander of the panzer troops in the east, General von Reichenau. One of von Rundstedt's counselors raised his hand to suggest the panzer spearheads roll west to the Ardennes forests of northern France to seek to cut off the southern flank of the American front line. Adolf Hitler had already given the order to press on after the Battle of the Bulge to split the Americans in two. Twenty divisions and 1,600 tanks should get the job done before Christmas. It was part of the focus for the Fuehrer to press on in his last days of power that would seize the land he had sworn would be his empire.

Reichenau and Rundstedt thought such a maneuver unwise for several reasons. Hitler had a penchant for miscalculation, and this scheme was just too risky. II Corps, under the command of General Courtney Hodges, would find itself with the northern flank of the U.S. Army in a perilous situation in the first few days of 1945. The men of the German Panzer Corps Guderian arrived in Ardennes Forest on December 12th. On December 18th, Hitler settled on Rundstedt's campaign plan for the coming weeks. Reichenau received Hitler's decision to advance into the Ardennes on December 21st. Reichenau was a hostile agitator for his boss Rundstedt, and we know this because the Fuehrer told everyone that day the men should applaud Reichenau when they met him on the battlefield. Reichenau, known to most Germans by his initials, "J." Reichenau went to the front the next day and talked with his chief of panzer engineers, General Hans Feyerabend. It was hoped the rugged, dark terrain would slow down the American advance.
