Introduction ===== Pterostilbene (ST), a naturally occurring analog of resveratrol, has been investigated recently in the context of ameliorating diabetic complications. To date, there is a lack of data concerning its potential effects on DNA methylation in experimental diabetes. Objectives ===== We therefore aimed to investigate the influence of ST on DNA methylation and oxidative stress in a mouse model of type 2 diabetes (T2D). Methods ===== Six-week-old male C57BL/6J mice were randomized to receive intraperitoneal injections of vehicle (0.9% sodium chloride) or ST (5 mg/kg per day) for eight weeks. At week 8, glucose was measured in serum and DNA methylation was assessed in skeletal muscle of vehicle- and ST-treated animals using a panel of 13 differentially methylated DNA regions. Additionally, gene expression of 5-hydroxymethylcytosine/5-formylcytosine (5-HMC/5-FMC) and the hypoxia-inducible factor-1 $\alpha$  (HIF-1 $\alpha$ ) was determined in skeletal muscle of mice using quantitative real-time PCR. Furthermore, we investigated whether the effect of ST on epigenetic markers was associated with decreased DNA methylation and increased HIF-1 $\alpha$  gene expression, as well as increased interleukin-6 (IL-6) levels. Results ===== ST treatment did not affect glucose concentrations or body weight. Furthermore, we did not observe any effect of ST on methylation in skeletal muscle of vehicle-treated T2D mice. However, epigenetic treatment with ST was associated with decreased methylation of several genes, including Nr4a3, Gadd45a, Ash1l, and Hif1a. Furthermore, ST treatment was associated with increased HIF-1 $\alpha$  gene expression and decreased IL-6 gene expression. Conclusion ===== Our results show that treatment with the natural analog of resveratrol, pterostilbene, is not associated with global DNA hypomethylation or hypermethylation in an animal model of T2D. However, treatment with pterostilbene is associated with decreased methylation of genes involved in glucose uptake, such as Nr4a3 and Gadd45a. Pterostilbene also upregulated
