Latest news about Tamil movie m kumaran son of mahalakshmiQ: Delphi XE6 Genuine ListView LongItemClick does not fire when clicked on header I'm using a ListView in a TPageControl on a TForm generated using the XE6 IDE and it is set to AutoHeight and AutoColumns and AutoRowCount. The ViewStyle is Delphi.ListViewStyle. The form contains a TListView where LongItemClick is set to On and the Selections property is set to True. As a test I implemented a custom column for the ListView containing a list of 100,000 sets of (a,b,c) tuples and clicking the ListView header takes less than a second to scroll to the 1000-2000 range. In this case it fires the OnLongItemClick event and the OnItemClick event for all the other cells in the row. However when I remove the custom column and uncheck the LongItemClick event the clicks are not handled. (I can see in the debugger that the OnLongItemClick method is not being called.) It seems that LongItemClick is not handled when not in the rightmost column and in the wrong row. I've tried click on a different column in a different row and LongItemClicked does work. I'm trying to get a scrolling view for my custom information that is a bit more manageable than having rows and columns. I've tried not declaring that column as a listview column and using the ControlLayout for the column and it just scrolls further down the list which does not work either. A: What you describe is the expected behavior. The reason LongItemClicked does not work when your custom column is not in the rightmost column and in the wrong row is because LongItemClicked is only fired when a mouse click is targeted to the LongItemText. The problem occurs because the LongItemText is displayed above the ListView and that is why the click register to your custom column and not to LongItemText. Q: Is it possible to recognize a person (with a name in a picture, and location) using their face? I have a database of

Some of these organizations seem to have little more in common than a reluctance to hand power over to a former regime. Others have clearly political agendas. The most notable of these are the Coalition for the Republic and the National Salvation Front. They've spawned a number of radical brigades and committees. The Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated Popular Front for Justice and Welfare (al-Hizb al-Adala wa al-Itisal) has a youth wing known as the Justice and Reform Movement. The General Union for Democratic Revolution, formerly headed by President Hosni Mubarak's former Interior Minister Habib al-Adly, holds sway in large swathes of the city of Alexandria. The head of Egypt's Coptic Orthodox Church, Pope Shenouda, leads the Redevelopment of the Egyptian Streets (also known as Awakening Sinai), which some consider the spiritual successor to the Muslim Brotherhood. But whether or not one considers these groups to be part of the Islamist movement that emerged after the overthrow of President Hosni Mubarak, they share a long-standing admiration for Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood. They present themselves as less Islamist than the Muslim Brotherhood, but for many of them their rivalry with Egypt's best-known Islamist group is the best sign of the times. So let's use this post to discuss them all. 1. The Coalition for the Republic The Coalition for the Republic, also known as the Union of the Resistance (or the Strong Egypt Initiative), was founded in March 2011. It gathers together: the El Baradei-inspired Egyptian Social Democratic Party; the Party of the Revolution (a youth-dominated party which has been praised by Islamist groups and criticized by Salafi-inspired organizations); and, most prominently, the Liberty and Justice Party (the second iteration of the Egyptian Social Democratic Party which was disowned by ElBaradei in favor of the smaller Party of the Revolution). It was founded as a response to Islamist groups accused of adopting a purely Islamist agenda. 2. The National Salvation Front
