T-Splines 3.4 for Rhino x64 (Rhinoceros). T-Splines 3.4 For Rhino X64 (Rhinoceros)Caries-resistant restorative materials and enamel remineralization. This review focuses on the physical properties of caries-resistant restorative materials. The main findings are that the development of caries-resistant restorative materials and the discovery of new methods for remineralization of caries-affected enamel and dentin have attracted considerable attention in restorative dentistry. The physical and chemical properties of enamel, which are conducive to the prevention of caries, suggest that the enamel surfaces are receptive to the incorporation of mineral, thereby leading to the formation of a net-like crystalline structure with a relatively large surface area that can achieve compressive stress concentrations at a low-shear deformation rate. This indicates that the hardness of the surface layer as well as that of the bulk material are very important. Materials that exhibit either a hardness below 5000 MPa or a large difference between the hardness of the surface layer and the bulk material are materials that might cause more stress than required for caries formation. A low-shear deformation rate also brings about both chemical and structural changes in the organic part of enamel. Therefore, further investigations into the structure and composition of the organic matter in enamel must be made. The investigation of the physical and chemical properties of the enamel is necessary for the discovery and application of a caries-resistant restorative material. In addition, the methods for remineralization of caries-affected enamel must be developed if caries-resistant restorative materials are to be utilized. These methods include the application of topical solutions that include calcium phosphates and fluoride salts. However, since these solutions have a short working time, the remineralization method must be applied in combination with an appropriate restorative 6d1f23a050
