A4/A3 paper is the paper size widely used in the office. Firma.Video technology is continuing to rapidly advance and its use is becoming more widespread in many different applications. Many systems are now able to receive and process digital video streams in addition to receiving and processing audio information, including telephony communications. Each of these disparate signals can be independently carried over different communications networks, for example over separate voice band or higher-frequency radio channels, or each can be carried over a separate frequency band of a communications network, for example over separate television broadcast channels. In such video based systems there is an increasing need to be able to process the signals in a way that is amenable to the signal processing requirements of the applications. For example, video signals can be received from digital video cameras and displayed directly as video images on the associated display device, or can be converted to digital data to be stored, transmitted, or processed further. One such system that receives and processes incoming video signals in a particularly advantageous manner is a video conferencing or teleconferencing system. In such systems, video information is transmitted from a source, such as a camera or telephone device, to a receiving device, such as a display or loudspeaker, over a communications network. The telecommunications networks that carry such information can vary from the simplest form to a system that is complex in its operation. For example, the simplest networks might be analogous to a "dial-up" telephone network, where a user may connect from any terminal such as a personal computer with a
