Free..Altered location of annexin A1 with calpain activation in cortical neurons and in Alzheimer's disease brain. The multifunctional, calcium-dependent phospholipid-binding protein annexin A1 is known to be present in the cerebral microvasculature and in cortical neurons and appears to be associated with amyloid beta peptide (Aβ). In the present study we have used immunolabeling with a novel monoclonal antibody that recognizes all four members of the annexin family of proteins to show that annexin A1 is present in the brains of Alzheimer's disease (AD) patients and that is altered in the brains of AD patients. We found that the monoclonal antibody very strongly labeled the activated microglia in the vicinity of senile plaques and in the abnormal neuropil in the vicinity of the senile plaques and in the abnormal regions of the apical dendrites of pyramidal neurons and, in AD brains, it labeled many of the senile plaques. The stain was very intense in AD brains that were not amyloid-laden. However, annexin A1 was present in the senile plaques of AD brains regardless of whether amyloid deposits were present. In addition to staining pyramidal neurons in the cortical plate, the antibody stained the amyloid plaques in the entorhinal cortex, and in AD brains stained the pyramidal neurons in the hippocampal Ammon's horn. Immunolabeling of free-floating sections of AD brains did not detect the presence of annexin A1 in the non-neuronal (astroglia, oligodendroglia, and endothelia) cells in or around the senile plaques. We also show that in the brains of AD patients, annexin A1 co-localizes with activated calpain and that in the cortical neurons of AD and age-matched control brains annexin A1 co-localizes with amyloid fibrils. Our data show that there is an increase in annexin A
