Previous studies have found that the provision of home care services does not improve hospital-based health outcomes, but access to home care services is possible for limited numbers of patients. Therefore, an important question is whether the provision of such services affects emergency room (ER) visits. This paper examines whether the provision of home care services reduces the number of ER visits for the elderly, using a field experiment. For two years, we provided limited home care services to elderly Taiwanese. We compared two conditions: one where clients received regular home care services and the other where they did not. After two years, we compared the number of ER visits in the home care intervention and control groups. The results suggested that the home care services had a significant impact on reducing ER visits among elderly individuals. Specifically, the monthly ER visit rate for the control group averaged 30.7%, significantly higher than the ER visit rate of 21.8% for the home care group. The results from this field experiment support the view that home care services are effective in reducing ER visits. The findings may have important implications for health policy decision-makers.Mild vitrectomy surgery for age-related macular degeneration.
